IMPETUS is our opportunity to create awareness to young people that organic waste is valuable and how to recycle it!

Summary

We're a group of researchers who love soil biology and education. We're passionate about helping to solve a critical issue: the excessive waste that humanity produces. Our project is all about developing and implementing easy-to-use organic waste recycling methods for everyday citizens. These methods include composting, maintaining chicken coops, and creating terrariums. These methods will turn organic waste into valuable substrates for plant agriculture and food for livestock. We're so excited to announce this initiative! It will be carried out with the involvement of students from five schools, where we will test the effectiveness of these recycling methods. By engaging students in this project, we not only evaluate the practicality and efficiency of our recycling strategies, but also educate future leaders on the importance of proper waste management. This dual approach ensures that we contribute to solving the waste problem while fostering environmental stewardship and sustainability among the next generation.
