Help people understand the impacts of glacier retreat

Summary

2025 marks the International Year of Glacier Preservation. In this context, the GV-CLIMA project will involve 80 citizen scientists in the Aosta Valley in monitoring the quality of meltwater from the Pré de Bar glacier. Participants, guided by local alpine experts, will collect environmental data using accessible, low-cost methods while also contributing emotional narratives that reflect their experiences and perceptions of climate change. This dual approach—science and storytelling—aims to foster deeper public engagement and a more holistic understanding of glacier retreat. Activities will include field campaigns, training sessions, and a final cultural event where scientific results and citizen stories will be presented to the public and local authorities. The project is designed not only to raise awareness but also to empower communities and inform climate adaptation strategies through open data and participatory action.
